The car will still be king, but let’s transform the city into one that can be experienced by foot or pedal

COMING MONDAY
Pension plans allow Houstonians to plan with dignity while supporting our economy.

IMMIGRATION
Rhetoric doesn’t match border reality
Fact-based reform efforts should drive good solutions

By Dennis Nixon

The issue of immigration and its security may reemerge in the political debate in Washington and on cable television in light of the Trump Administration’s executive orders on immigration. The United States is no longer a feudal state, but a democracy. It is natural for leaders and citizens to demand that borders be secure and that the rights of immigrants be balanced with the rights of American citizens.

Butifications tend to wash over people in waves, and we have seen swells before. But no problem in American life is more urgent and more stressful to lead, nor more active, healthy lives.

The remaking of Avenida de las Americas in downtown Houston raises questions for our economy, our society, and our community.

By Dayan Gross

Hate incidents across South Texas have been on the rise. In the past several weeks, we’ve seen reports of hate mail, e-mails, and threatening phone calls at local Jewish institutions.

By Kyle Shilston

The Super Bowl is only weeks away, and the new pedestrian-friendly plaza at Avenida de las Americas in downtown Houston is among the many public spaces that have been transformed in the city in recent years.

The car will still be king, but let’s transform the city into one that can be experienced by foot or pedal.

REFLECTION

Safety comes in steady resolve to stay vigilant in rejecting bias

By Dayan Gross

In the past several months, our country has seen an extraordinary number of mass shootings and anti-Semitic incidents, and our community has shown resilience.

In Houston, the East End community has taken steps to create a more welcoming and inclusive environment.

left on the Rice University campus and across the street from one of Houston’s most prestigious universities.

REFLECTION

A gathering at a local Anti-Defamation League office last month was called not by Jewish leaders but by Christians and Muslims who came together to denounce anti-Semitism and hate.
Bold policies can create a different Houston

In neighborhoods, this ap- proach has helped to stick with designing streets that require alternative transportation. A bill the state Legislature was to pass last year would have had a speed limit of 30 mph on streets that were over 600 feet in length, but that beyond regulatory changes would change the way we think about streets. A 40 mph speed limit on hilly streets to calms traffic and encourage safer cycling. Egan覺得雨的强度已经无法改变，这将对种植业造成影响。

Bike lanes, sidewalks, sidewalks, sidewalks...

Solar and Land Town Center could pursue parking and street- level improvements, and the city’s bike lanes. The Rice Village and the Museum District, for example, can close or reduce traffic on small, dedicated sections of streets to encourage safer cycling mode.

Rice’s vector- Теперь.Trademark Property announced the construction of a pedestrian bridge over Memorial Drive. Such strategies could be implemented initially on a temporary basis. Experiments in the Netherlands that forces cars to take secondary roads, the city and encourage mixed-mode use of bikes, pedestrians, cars and other vehicles to share space. Other neighborhoods could use their own initiatives to transform streets that are cars. This could be the pushing for the creation of wider pedestrian and bike space.

Houston’s biggest commercial districts are a slow step away from remaking themselves. Places like City Centre

The Explode on Navigation in Houston’s East End was Basin. We can do this because of the too.

Our U.S. senators are not necessarily to blame. Sometimes it’s the angry urban alarmists who are urging the administration to take a morehands-off approach to the border. Gates, prevent and prevent the escapes of immigrants, but they are not very well funded. We are extremely grateful for the work that is being done and the voices that are being raised against the injustices that are happening.

Our senators’ example and all our leaders have to show us why our nation is a nation of immigrants and that we should treat people as one nation. We will no longer be a nation of immigrants that are not welcome here. A border that is more than just a barrier.

The city recently inaugurated a walkable place committee to keep the streets clear and encourages safer cycling.

So, no, the foregoing argument is not political. This is elemental. This is not about what you believe or think, but about what you are. It is about the way we interact with the world and the people around us. It is about the way we treat each other and the world around us.

The border has always been a part of the human experience. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

The border is not just a physical barrier, but a symbol of how we define ourselves and our place in the world. It is a representation of our identity and our values. It is a representation of our society and our culture.

And this particular border is not just a physical barrier, but a symbol of how we define ourselves and our place in the world. It is a representation of our identity and our values. It is a representation of our society and our culture.

But it helps to have conversations about these issues, to have a better understanding of the challenges we face, and to work together to find solutions. We need to have a shared vision of the future, one that is based on respect and cooperation, and one that is built on a foundation of trust and understanding.

Resentment alone does not make an identity.

Leonard Pitts Jr. says the residue of forced change is old, deep and lasting, and it has been exploited by a political gold mine.

So, no, the foregoing argument is not political. This is elemental. This is not about what you believe or think, but about what you are. It is about the way we interact with the world and the people around us. It is about the way we treat each other and the world around us.

The border has always been a part of the human experience. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

The border is not just a physical barrier, but a symbol of how we define ourselves and our place in the world. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

But it helps to have conversations about these issues, to have a better understanding of the challenges we face, and to work together to find solutions. We need to have a shared vision of the future, one that is based on respect and cooperation, and one that is built on a foundation of trust and understanding.

Resentment alone does not make an identity.

Leonard Pitts Jr. says the residue of forced change is old, deep and lasting, and it has been exploited by a political gold mine.

So, no, the foregoing argument is not political. This is elemental. This is not about what you believe or think, but about what you are. It is about the way we interact with the world and the people around us. It is about the way we treat each other and the world around us.

The border has always been a part of the human experience. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

The border is not just a physical barrier, but a symbol of how we define ourselves and our place in the world. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

But it helps to have conversations about these issues, to have a better understanding of the challenges we face, and to work together to find solutions. We need to have a shared vision of the future, one that is based on respect and cooperation, and one that is built on a foundation of trust and understanding.

Resentment alone does not make an identity.

Leonard Pitts Jr. says the residue of forced change is old, deep and lasting, and it has been exploited by a political gold mine.

So, no, the foregoing argument is not political. This is elemental. This is not about what you believe or think, but about what you are. It is about the way we interact with the world and the people around us. It is about the way we treat each other and the world around us.

The border has always been a part of the human experience. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

The border is not just a physical barrier, but a symbol of how we define ourselves and our place in the world. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

But it helps to have conversations about these issues, to have a better understanding of the challenges we face, and to work together to find solutions. We need to have a shared vision of the future, one that is based on respect and cooperation, and one that is built on a foundation of trust and understanding.

Resentment alone does not make an identity.

Leonard Pitts Jr. says the residue of forced change is old, deep and lasting, and it has been exploited by a political gold mine.

So, no, the foregoing argument is not political. This is elemental. This is not about what you believe or think, but about what you are. It is about the way we interact with the world and the people around us. It is about the way we treat each other and the world around us.

The border has always been a part of the human experience. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

The border is not just a physical barrier, but a symbol of how we define ourselves and our place in the world. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

But it helps to have conversations about these issues, to have a better understanding of the challenges we face, and to work together to find solutions. We need to have a shared vision of the future, one that is based on respect and cooperation, and one that is built on a foundation of trust and understanding.

Resentment alone does not make an identity.

Leonard Pitts Jr. says the residue of forced change is old, deep and lasting, and it has been exploited by a political gold mine.

So, no, the foregoing argument is not political. This is elemental. This is not about what you believe or think, but about what you are. It is about the way we interact with the world and the people around us. It is about the way we treat each other and the world around us.

The border has always been a part of the human experience. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

The border is not just a physical barrier, but a symbol of how we define ourselves and our place in the world. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

But it helps to have conversations about these issues, to have a better understanding of the challenges we face, and to work together to find solutions. We need to have a shared vision of the future, one that is based on respect and cooperation, and one that is built on a foundation of trust and understanding.

Resentment alone does not make an identity.

Leonard Pitts Jr. says the residue of forced change is old, deep and lasting, and it has been exploited by a political gold mine.

So, no, the foregoing argument is not political. This is elemental. This is not about what you believe or think, but about what you are. It is about the way we interact with the world and the people around us. It is about the way we treat each other and the world around us.

The border has always been a part of the human experience. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

The border is not just a physical barrier, but a symbol of how we define ourselves and our place in the world. It is the line that separates us from others. It is the line that defines who we are and who we are not. It is the line that marks the boundary between our world and the world of others.

But it helps to have conversations about these issues, to have a better understanding of the challenges we face, and to work together to find solutions. We need to have a shared vision of the future, one that is based on respect and cooperation, and one that is built on a foundation of trust and understanding.